ANÁLISIS ARTÍSTICO

Preparatory drawing for Caprice 59. And they are not leaving yet! The drawing, executed with sanguine lines, contains only the outline of the nightmare, in which he manages to reflect the tension between the weight of the stone and the strength of the spectre trying to prevent it from crushing them. But it is the aquatint, and with it the play of light and shadow, that will truly create this "horror of the vague and the infinite" in the final print.

Matilla comments that French Romantics such as Gautier and Baudelaire were particularly interested in this composition, in which they saw an iconic representation of the beings that inhabit the world of darkness and terror. For the Enlightenment writers it was an allegory of how "reason", symbolised by the great slab, was finally going to bury all reactionary forces.
